A stop at the grocery store to shop for food for lunch, that's all. That's fine. I'll pick up some left-over cookies from the afternoon snack when I get home. Or maybe a hot dog or two. I prefer not to waste any calories, so I'll just call up the cashier and order more take out. Maybe that'll make me hungry, and I'll forget all about my lunch and eat some more. I can't resist that type of diet. Me either. Wasting food is so easy. And I love to waste. So easy. So much easier to waste food than to sit down and eat a full meal. Or just a sandwich. I get hungry on the way home, but my inner alarm clock doesn't work if I don't buy anything for lunch. There's no feeling of deprivation if I don't buy a whole new bag of chips. While her husband was out doing his job, she was dealing with the kids, all the homework and preparations for the school year. She was about to lose it and her husband, yet again. It had been a tough day. Her youngest had argued with her about a DVD they were supposed to watch. Her oldest was doing something he was not supposed to be doing. Both kids were getting into trouble. Yet Sarah had given up trying to reason with them. "I can't do this. I'm about to lose it," she thought as she began to cry. She ran to the phone and dialed her husband's number. His cell phone was turned off and he wasn't answering her calls. What was she going to do? She was on the verge of losing it, the whole family. Sarah saw a police officer approaching her and her kids in the front yard. She ran to him and informed him that her husband was missing. The officer, in his little squad car, rushed to Sarah's house. He checked the house, even looked into the back yard. He noticed something that looked like a foot sticking out from under some bushes. He pulled out the foot and it was indeed, her husband. The officer had been trained to deal with this situation. He knew that if he didn't deal with this right away, her husband could die. "What should I do with the body?" the officer asked himself. He pulled out a blanket and placed it over the man. He ran back to his squad car, grabbed the blanket and wrapped it around the husband. As he was about to drive off with the man, he said, "I don't know what to do with this body." He turned to the officer who was sitting in the passenger seat. �
